

The Brahui language: recovering the past, documenting the present, and projecting the future

Elena Bashir, The University of Chicago

Abstract:

This paper is an effort to explore the state of past linguistic research and publication on the Brahui language, encourage comparison of the language as documented at these earlier stages with the state of the language in 2014, and explore possibilities for and avenues of documenting today's Brahui language using new developments in the field of language documentation and technologies that have emerged in recent years.